

the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are employed in the public sector has increased by 1.5 million (1990–1999) and the number of people in the private sector has increased by 1.2 million (1990–1999).

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the public sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the public sector.

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the private sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the private sector.

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the voluntary sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the voluntary sector.

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the independent sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the independent sector.

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the social care sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the social care sector.

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the health care sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the health care sector.

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the mental health sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the mental health sector.

There is a growing emphasis on the need to improve the quality of care in the primary care sector. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the introduction of the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) and the National Clinical Audit Programme (NCAP).

The NPSA was established in 1999 and is responsible for promoting patient safety and reducing the risk of harm to patients. The NCAP was established in 1999 and is responsible for monitoring and improving the quality of care in the primary care sector.